The Adriatic sea and ice cream

FABIO GALLO

Cured by: FIC

Born in 1979, Apulian by birth but now a resident of Rimini for some time. A lover of the sea and all simple fish, refinement and enhancement of local products are the key to his constantly moving cuisine. A cuisine based on the territory, with a continuous focus on the seasonality of products and the philosophy of the least possible waste leads him to seek the collaboration of small companies and 'local' production companies. Since 2021 he has been chef patron of his restaurant on the beach in Rimini, which he opened together with two partners. The name 'OLTRE' was not chosen at random and leaves plenty of room for the imagination. His continuous desire to grow led him a few years ago into the world of competitions where he has achieved excellent results. He currently holds a first-place Italian title, a world silver medal and a bronze medal at the Olympics, plus various provincial and regional victories. Since 2021 he has become part of the Nazionale Italiana Cuochi in the Events Segment.

The production of coffee has a close tie with social and environmental sustainability. The expansion of coffee production in Latin America in response to higher consumer demand is, in some cases, accompanied by several threats, including water pollution, biodiversity loss, soil erosion, agrochemical use, deforestation, waste generation and labour exploitation. However, coffee producers and companies have shown high dynamism in addressing sustainability issues and proactively looking for solutions in the last years. In the framework of the 44th SIGEP, the European Union Programme of cooperation for sustainable production in Latin America - AL INVEST Verde – also implemented by the International Italo – Latin American Organization – IILA which has been working in the promotion of Latin American coffee sector for approximately 20 years, proposes a dialogue among European and Latin American stakeholders of the chain to discuss good practices and main challenges to an environmental and social friendly coffee

GIAN LUCA FORINO

Gian Luca Forino, pastry chef and traveller as well as CAST Alimenti lecturer, on stage at the Pastry Arena to present his idea of contemporary pastry, where contamination tastes like evolution.

Sensory analysis of raw materials, expanding one's range of ingredients, choosing and using the best techniques to enhance their taste and discovering the most suitable combinations to guide, surprise and satisfy an increasingly curious and demanding clientele, making them discover new sensations and new possibilities. All this in a demo with a contemporary flavour, in which Maestro Forino will create two products: a toffee caramel spiced with star anise and mace, and an almond and pecan praline with coriander seeds.

The challenges of the bar of the future: quality, professionalism and innovation

Cured by: Fipe

First the pandemic crisis and then the energy crisis have profoundly changed market dynamics with major repercussions on the organisational and management set-ups of companies. The opening hours of businesses that must come to terms with the optimal use of human resources and the difficulty of finding them, the extraordinary increases in costs that must be measured against the adjustment of price lists, the needs of the consumer between the search for security, smart working and new sociability, are all phenomena that oblige the bar world to rethink the supply model to one hinged on the economic sustainability of the business. Indeed, it is no secret that over the last few years the number of bars in Italy has been progressively decreasing. Through the testimony of experts and entrepreneurs, the meeting aims to fuel a serious debate on issues that are of strategic importance today for the development of the bar.

Rules and tools to enhance a country's heritage

Curated by: Fipe

Cafes, pastry shops, ice cream parlours and confectioners are a heritage to be protected and enhanced. And even more so when it comes to activities that have passed through the history of the country, as in the case of the hundreds of historic premises located in every corner of our cities, from small to large, and of our territories. In recent years, regions and municipalities have tried, each in their own way, to identify their historic premises and more generally historic shops. The result is a Babel of regulations in which an establishment is historic if it is 40 years old in one region or city while it is only historic if it is 60 or 70 years old in a different region or city. With these assumptions, it is difficult, or indeed impossible, to set up national valorisation and incentive policies capable of protecting this great national heritage. This was the motivation behind the Fipe project, designed to define a standard that identifies historic premises with nationwide valid criteria. The aim of the meeting is to take stock of the prospects of this standard and the business support measures that will be developed in the coming months.

Coffee culture in the light of sustainability and digital development

GIANCARLO SAMARITANI

Sustainability and digital development have become and will become more and more fundamental elements for the coffee supply chain and for all operators.

Two examples:

There are more and more companies, no longer just the large ones, which produce a sustainability report every year to transparently document both the economic and social and environmental aspects that guide the company in its relationship with shareholders and consumers. Sustainability is already a key aspect to ensure the future of coffee plantations.

Digital development permeates the supply chain. We could talk about it for hours. Because all machines, from coffee roasters to espresso machines, now have a thinking head, which can be controlled/repared remotely. But there are two even more important clues. Telecommunications and the Internet which have brought stock market prices to all companies and the possibility of contacting sellers and producers directly, but also end customers with e-commerce. And then the blockchain, a mature technology, which is becoming increasingly essential for documenting all the steps from the field to the cup in a transparent and detailed way.

The following will contribute: Andrea Antonelli, Michele Cannone, Alessandro Galtieri, Maurizio Giuli, Andrej Godina, Giancarlo Samaritani and Francesco Sanapo.

Coffee culture in the light of sustainability and digital development - with English simultaneous translation

Simultaneous translation: English

Sustainability and digital development have become and will become more and more fundamental elements for the coffee supply chain and for all operators.

Two examples:

There are more and more companies, no longer just the large ones, which produce a sustainability report every year to transparently document both the economic and social and environmental aspects that guide the company in its relationship with shareholders and consumers. Sustainability is already a key aspect to ensure the future of coffee plantations.

Digital development permeates the supply chain. We could talk about it for hours. Because all machines, from coffee roasters to espresso machines, now have a thinking head, which can be controlled/repared remotely. But there are two even more important clues. Telecommunications and the Internet which have brought stock market prices to all companies and the possibility of contacting sellers and producers directly, but also end customers with e-commerce. And then the blockchain, a mature technology, which is becoming increasingly essential for documenting all the steps from the field to the cup in a transparent and detailed way.

The following will contribute: Andrea Antonelli, Michele Cannone, Alessandro Galtieri, Maurizio Giuli, Andrej Godina, Giancarlo Samaritani and Francesco Sanapo.
